Notes from 03/08
Command Line
- Mac OS and Linux both built on UNIX and share a command line
- UNIX philosophy - Lots of tiny programs rather than huge programs
- Unix philosophy can use pipes to join tiny programs and connecting many tiny different programs
- Windows file system c:// root everything else / root
- ~ refers to home
- relative paths, changing to a sub folder from current folder
- . refers to current directory
- .. up a directory
- bin = binary, duh, sbin different binary
- lib holds libraries
- usr holds bin and lib specific to users
- > to redirect data into a file whereas >> appends to a file
- cat prints contents of file to terminal
- when it comes to file names, spaces must be escaped by either enclosing the whole section in brackets or \ escaping spaces
- renaming involves using move within the current directory
- whoami tells me who i am logged in as
- ln -s creates a symbolic link
- permissions -rw-r—r— 1st is the type, - for file d for directory l for link etc rw is for read write
- the next dash is for executable if the dash is an x that means that it is executable the next is the permissions the user /owner has and then the group
- to change permissions use chmod and you can use chmod u(user)-rwx to take away and you would use u+rwx to give permission
- grep searches a file or folder, you can join this with l with ls to search the directory for a file or folder
- executables will turn red when changed
- chmod 777 is the same as UGO+rwx
- as is 666 the same as UGO+rw
- each number stands for what each type of user has access to, so a 7 in user but only a 4 in the second two means the only person with full access is the user , read = 4 write = 2 executable = 1, much smarter way of using chmod, much less hassle and writing
